DESCRIBE THE PRESENT AND ORIGINAL (if known) PHYSICAL APPEARANCE

Date of Erection - South half about 1800 and North half about 1858

Present Condition - The building is fairly well preserved and unchanged, except doubled in length.

NUMBER of stories - one

Materials of Construction - The foundations are stone. The walls of the south half are logs set vertically, and those of the north half are studs. The roof rafters are oak. Floors are pine boards, varying in width. The roof surface is modern, covered with composition shingles. Interior walls are generally plaster on wood studs.

Frederick Koeper writes:

"The earlier portion of this house is on the south and is built in the typical French palisade log construction resting on a stone foundation. The north portion was added by a later owner, F.W. Brickey, whose name is locally associate with the house even though he moved on about 1870. Mr. Brickey's north addition is of the newer stud-wall construction, and he also weatherboarded the earlier portion before he moved into it about 1855."

John Drury writes:

"Originally, Creole House was a one-family dwelling built of logs, set vertically, or in what is known as the "French-Canadian" style. In 1858, the house was enlarged by the addition of a north wing of frame construction and the whole was covered with siding. This made it, in reality, a double house. Today, it presents the appearance of a long, squat, frame abode, its low-pitched roof extending outward to form a porch the entire length of the house."

"In the log house a son was born to the Hansbroughs in 1848. This son was Henry Clay Hansbrough, who in his mature life became one of the political leaders of North Dakota, its first congressman, and afterward a senator from that state for eighteen years. He was sometimes called the 'father' of irrigation in the United States. For many years he was a national figure in liberal Republican politics and continued active until his death in 1933."

"Since its enlargement, Creole House has been a double-family dwelling. After Franklin Brickey moved elsewhere, it was occupied by his son, John. The house is still owned by the Brickey estate. Surrounded by an old-fashioned cast-iron fence and shaded by several ancient maples, Creole House, with its gable roof and long, low, Southern style porch, stands as a picturesque reminder of the town's early days. Its interior walls are of plaster and the rooms are simple in design. Fireplaces, with wooden mantels, adorn the living rooms."

and Carrie
